EASTER 2023

Easter

One of the important promises of Easter is that the present moment and its possible distress, diagnosis, or misfortune does not have the last word on our lives. There is always the possibility of God's grace wiggling its way to the surface of our lives bringing something new.

In the Easter morning story of John's Gospel there are three themes that shine through. The first is how we might see and believe – or not. The second is the power of hearing our true name spoken into our present distress. The third is having the patience to endure the difficulties that simply come with being a human being.

Brought by Mary, Peter and the other disciple look into the tomb. They believe they see an empty tomb. That is after all what they expected to see. Before their eyes is a pile of unwrapped linen – no body and no rational explanation. The men return home.

Mary then looks again in the tomb – but brings more of herself to the experience. She looks with her heart not simply her mind. She sees an angel. And afterwards she allows herself to feel the full weight of her grief at Jesus' death – and Jesus joins her. We may face the same choice many times daily. Our lives flow pretty much from our expectations. The more we're able to be present to any moment or situation in our lives, the more likely we are to see grace rather than emptiness – and to know how deeply we are accompanied through out our entire lives.

That this entire story takes place in a garden is yet another invitation to remember God's abiding presence with us – we're once again in the garden of Genesis – and all that God saw was good. Even you and me.

Easter is about hope and God's good grace to help us be the people we were born to be, named to be at our baptisms. The present day and its blessings and trials is our window into the reality of the resurrection for us. Can we bring our selves fully into our own lives, hear our name called, and have the courage to wait for God to move in our lives.

May this Easter season be a blessing to you and be a reminder and a gift of God's possibilities to bring something new and unexpected to our lives.
